can king, but on a somewhat different level. In dealing with collective violence, and more specifically with a certain mode of "exclusion", there must always have been an act of expulsion based at least in part on ridicule. In the modern world our everyday, much diluted forms of social ostracism are generally based on ridicule; much of contemporary literature is explicitly or implicitly concerned with this phenomenon. We need only think of those social categories and individuals that provide the victims in scapegoat rites—vagabonds, beggars, cripples—to recognize that derivation of one form or another plays a large part in the negative feelings that find expression in the course of the ritual sacrifice and that are finally purified and purged by it.

We have here a body of material that calls out for detailed analysis. Because the relevance of this material to my general thesis presents, at least in principle, no real problem, let us pass on to other forms of religion and consider how they can fit my scheme. Let us turn first to a religious practice that may appear very different from those previously considered but one that is in actuality closely related. Simply, the worship of the dead.

No one "joins a cult." People recruited into destructive groups think they are doing something else, something beneficial and worthwhile. Anyone can be recruited given the right sales pitch and the right conditions in one's life. We are all potential victims. The convenient rationalization that the person himself was responsible for bringing on the harm allows one to feel different from the victim and somehow more in control and safer from such random harm.

Inevitably the moment comes when violence can only be countered by more violence.

The result is victims tricked into believing they were completely responsible for their decision to get into coercive persuasion programs. A common misconception is that the victims were from bad families, were weak, or did something that was responsible for getting them into that situation.

It is wise to avoid contact with the sick.

It is very hard for former members, especially high level and long term members, to admit they have been thoroughly deceived and speak up about what they know. The group has rocked and tranced them into believing that they are totally and completely responsible for everything that happens to them and the group is never responsible.
